BACKGROUND:

Former City of Newcastle Alderman and Councillor (1986-1995) and Deputy Lord Mayor of the City of Newcastle 1987-1989 has sadly passed away.

Mr Nichols was a very well-respected union leader, first elected as an Official for the Australian Manufacturing Workers’ Union in 1981, serving as the President of Newcastle Trades Hall Council from 1983 to 1997 and as a workers representative on the BHP Steelworks Transition Steering Team.

Even in retirement, Mr Nichols continued to make a contribution to Newcastle, serving as a Director of the Labour Co-operative Group from 2002 and a Director of the Hunter TAFE Foundation from 2000 until his passing.

Mr Nichols was very well respected by all sides of politics, as a great bloke, a true gentleman, and a fighter for the working class.

Union stalwart Denis Nichols is enjoying a well-earned retirement and a better diet, IAN KIRKWOOD reports.

As one of the council’s representatives at Shortland Electricity (a forerunner to EnergyAustralia), he spent nine years on the board, the final five until 1995 as chairman.

It is these high points the Labor movement most cares to remember, along with the indisputable energy and determination Mr Nichols showed in fighting countless industrial disputes and company closures along the way.

From this point of view, it is inappropriate to remember Mr Nichols as the candidate who lost Newcastle for Labor in the 1988 ‘Greenslides’ election, yet it is precisely this tag that most dogs share.

In an interview this week Mr Nichols said there were a number of reasons why real estate agent George Keegan, a conservative Independent, did the unthinkable and wrested Newcastle from Labor’s grasp.

A redistribution had given the seat unfavourable new boundaries, and, probably more importantly, the high-profile Margaret Henry had resigned from the ALP and was running against then Alderman Nichols as an Independent.

Newcastle was one of three safe Hunter seats lost by Labor in 1988. Stan Neilly in Cessnock and Don Bowman in Swansea were able to regain their places at the following election but it was Bryce Gaudry, not Mr Nichols, the ALP turned to in Newcastle in 1991.

Mr Nichols was elected as an organiser with the Australian Manufacturing Workers Union (the metalworkers) on February 2, 1981.

By 1983 he was Trades Hall president, alongside secretary and Communist Party member Peter Barrack.

Their ‘reasonable working relationship’ all but dissolved in 1989 when Mr Barrack stood against Mr Nichols in Newcastle City Council elections on an Independent ticket with current Lord Mayor John Tate.

The move surprised many in the union movement.

Similar questions were asked in sections of the ALP a few years later when avowed left-winger Mr Nichols worked closely and well with then Lord Mayor John McNaughton, a prominent member of the ALP Right.

‘When you are in an election the representatives of that team have a duty to support the team and one another, including the Lord Mayor,’ Mr Nichols said.

‘It’s fair to say that I had a good personal relationship with John in that period.’

Mr Nichols says he is disappointed that present ALP councillors are even thinking about dumping the ad valorem rating system and claims the council made a mistake in swapping citywide franchise for council wards.

‘People are pressured in their wards to take certain decisions that are not in the best interests of the whole of the city,’ he said.

Politics is a hard game and when Mr Nichols speaks about the past there are plenty of references to ‘my enemies’ or ‘my opponents’.

But enemies can still command respect.

Mr Keegan said he had a ‘good relationship’ with Mr Nichols, who ‘had a job to do for the trade union movement’.

Australian Workers Union secretary Kevin Maher said he had ‘battled heads’ with Mr Nichols over the years but knew that he never gave less than 100% for his union.

‘He is a committed community member as well as a trade unionist and I think it’s a shame that the stupidity of Unsworth’s policies robbed him of the chance to be the State Member for Newcastle, because I think he would have been a good member,’ Mr Maher said.

A number of people, including Mr McNaughton and Newcastle MLA Bryce Gaudry said Mr Nichols had never received the kudos he should have for steering Newcastle Foreshore Park through to completion.

‘The railway shed down there would never have been kept if Denis had not fought and fought hard for it,’ Mr Gaudry said.

Mr Nichols accepted a major role in preserving the railway shed but said the honours for the park should go to former councillors including Allan Morris, the retiring Newcastle, federal Labor MP.

Industrial relations has changed a lot in the past 20 years but Mr Nichols is confident about the future of the union movement.

‘There’s a downturn in Newcastle at the moment but some unions, such as the metalworkers, are putting in new initiatives on recruiting and reassessing their positions on a lot of things that were unfortunately let go by the wayside,’ he said.

One of the ‘great problems’ for unionism has been the decline of big industrial employers such as BHP and the State Dockyard.
‘On the job in my day young workers got a good education about what the trade union movement is all about,’ Mr Nichols said.

He said the policies of the Howard Government had shown people the need for a strong union movement, dismissing what he called ‘the myth of the middle class’.
